Students of Gallaudet and their friends occupied the main section of the hall. while the pupils of the primary department were seated on the stage at the east end of the chapel. Members of the aculty, clad in caps and gowns, indicaive of their doctorates, with members of the board of directors and several visi-

Dr. James Brittan Clark, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, pronounced the invocation. Half a century ago Gallaudet College was formally organized at a meeting held in the First Presbyterian Church, and the selection of the present pastor of the church to open the exercises commemorating the golden jubilee of the college was considered eminently fitting.

Reads History of College.

Following the invocation President Emeritus Gallaudet read a brief history of the institution. Dr. Gallaudet's address was rendered in the deaf mute sign language by President Hall. He told of how his father had destined him for a business career, and how in pursuance of his father's wishes he entered a bank at the close of his high school studies. After a few years of this work. suance of his father's wishes he entered a bank at the close of his high school is an honest man, for he has a walk at the close of his high school is an honest man, for he has a walk word.

little tto his liking, and laid his plans for taking up the work of teaching the deaf. At that time, he said. Congress had just established in Washington the Washington School for the Deaf and Amos Kendall, in whose honor Kendall Green was named, wrote to him suggesting the possibility of the establishment of a mattenal institution. After various vicissitudes and as the result of long-continued labor, Dr. Gallaudet said, the college was organized and at a meeting in June, 1864, he was elected its first president.

The growth of the college from its organization fifty years ago to the present time was outlined in President Hall's address. The first degree conferred by Gallaudet, he said, was given to Melville Ballard in 1866. Dr. Ballard remained with the college as an instructor for more than forty years.

In 1887, President Hall said, in response to innumerable requests from all parts of the country, the college was made a coeducational institution and women were admitted on the same footing as men. The normal school, for the instruction of persons purposing to follow the profession of teaching the deaf, was opened in 1892. This year, said President Hall, the enrollment in the collegiate department of the institution is 113, the students coming from thirty-one states and from the Dominion of Canada. A total of 359 graduates of the college have been given the degree of bachelor of arts, while forty have been made master of arts. The college grounds now embrace somewhat more than 100 acres, and the buildings represent an investment of about $500,000. The Food Drink for All Ages buildings represent an investment about $500,000.
